1. The major leftist organizations in the Chiri-san (127-44, 35-20) area are the following:

South Kyongsang People's Committee of the People's Republic of Korea, 21 persons, in Sinrim-ri, Sanchong-myon (127-64, 35-25), Sanchong County.

South Kyongsang Committee of the Korean Labor Party, 130 persons, including 50 guards from the Youth Alliance, in Satten village, Pyongrim-ri, Sanchong-myon.

Chinju (128-05, 35-12) City Committee and committees of Kochang (127-55, 35-41), Sanchong, Hyopchon (128-10, 35-34), Chinyang (127-58, 35-10), Hanyang (127-44, 35-31), and Hadong (128-01, 35-55) Counties of the Korean Labor Party, 40 persons, in Pyongrim-ri.

Headquarters of the South Kyongsang People's Guerrilla Corps, 1,500 armed and 1,500 unarmed personnel, in Pyongrim-ri.

South Kyongsang Democratic Youth League, 20 persons, in Sanjung-ri, Sanchong-myon.

South Kyongsang Farmers' League, 8 persons, in Sanjung-ri.

South Kyongsang Women's League, 10 persons, in Sanjung-ri.

2. In March 1951, these organizations had almost ceased to function because of the constant repressive measures against them by the Republic of Korea military and police authorities and the lack of cooperation from the local population. They still control four villages at the foot of Chiri-san and occupy all of Sanchong-myon, with concentrations in the villages of Pyongrim-ri and Sinrim-ri. From these bases they work out into parts of Sinchon-myon (127-45, 35-20), Hyopchon-myon (128-09, 35-36), and Machon-myon (127-44, 35-23) in Hanyang County. In these myon and in Wichon-myon (127-50, 35-44), they have even succeeded in collecting taxes in kind.

3. The total number of armed guerrillas in the area is estimated at 1,600 at most. There are six guerrilla units under the South Kyongsang People's Guerrilla Corps Headquarters, all directed by leaders well qualified for political and military operations. One of the six units, the 102 Guerrilla Unit, is semi-independent and does not follow the same lines as the other groups. It is composed of remnants of the old 6 Division from the Korean forces in eastern Manchuria with the Chinese Communists; these troops were in the area during the summer of 1950. No local Korean personnel have been admitted to the unit. It is equipped with various weapons, including cannon and mortars, but has no ammunition. Unarmed guerrilla forces amount to about 2,000.
4. The Communists are restricted within the area they dominate. The approximately 10,000 local inhabitants are not permitted by the Communists to travel outside their own villages. The Communists themselves have contact only with the Communist people's committee of Sachon County and have made no connections with the Communist groups in the adjacent counties of Yangsan, Tongnae, Ulsan, and Miryang. The liaison route between the South Kyongsang Committee and the Sachon County Committee is the only means by which the former receives news of the outside world.
5. Contacts between the two groups are maintained by courier every three days. The courier from the Sachon County Committee leaves Kommyong (127-57, 35-07) after dinner and walks for 40 minutes to a spot on a village path at the foot of a hill. He claps his hands twice to notify the courier from the South Kyongsang Committee of his arrival and receives an answering signal of two claps. The couriers exchange newspapers and other items.
6. For additional contact with the outside, the South Kyongsang Committee in February sent out an agent to work in Chinju. His mission was to communicate with the surviving leftist elements in that city and to make arrangements for the transfer of the Chiri-san group to Chinju or elsewhere. He was also to obtain South Kyongsang residence certificates, films, chemicals, and paper for printing. This individual was apprehended by the ROK police after 20 days in Chinju, during which he had been constantly in hiding and had not been able to begin his mission.
7. Although the Communists in Chiri-san are well-protected, their position is showing its disadvantages. The food situation was becoming critical; although they had collected 1,300 bags of rice in the harvest of 1950, they had only two weeks' food left on 12 February 1951. The amount of food they can obtain from local sources is very small, and the outside supply line is tenuous. Moreover, they are completely cut off from all ROK contacts and are unable to expand for purposes of propaganda or sabotage. The attitude of the local population outside the zone of Communist control is definitely hostile.
8. Faced with these difficulties, in February the Communists were planning a program of re-organization, with the following features:
 - a. Unnecessary personnel in the area are to return home in order to serve as liaison with the core which remains and also to penetrate into the ROK population and government.
 - b. The present base is to be held by a small detachment of guerrillas, while the remainder of the force moves to a new base, separating into smaller groups to avoid destruction through a single attack.
 - c. The struggle to obtain arms and men will be intensified. Local youth will be kidnapped for indoctrination as future guerrillas.
 - d. Guerrillas with arms are to remain in the present base but are to seek more of their food through raids on the villages. They are to conceal their true location by feints from different points.

- e. Contact is to be established with Communists in eastern South Kyongsang, particularly Pusan and nearby counties. Pusan Communists in Chiri-san are to be sent home to penetrate local party committees.
- f. All activities are to be conducted in smaller groups. There will be increased attacks on small villages, while the guerrilla center moves to the cities.
